About Love

When it comes to relationship and love, I usually look out for the focal point of a person's Astrological chart. These differ for men and women. The Sun governs a man, his character, his career, his health and most importantly, his perspective in life. With regards to a man interested in his female companion, I turn to the Moon to provide me with the necessary information about her moods, home keeping abilities, emotional maturity, support and child up-bringing abilities.

The 5th House is what is considered the "love zone", and I need to see if this has been plagued by negativity. When pursuing the possibility of a union or marriage, the 7th House gives much insight into the potential of that love and how stable it could be emotionally and financially. Indeed, there is a multitude of information on what constitutes a stable relationship from an Astrological viewpoint, and these need to be checked against the current trends of planetary transit, for they determine any harmonious or threatening forces at play.

No matter what context love is viewed in, it is complicated. Even trying to define love proves to be a task, for everyone sees love in their own perspective. Some believe in storybook love, others ground love in hard reality. There is passionate love, and there is stable love. Whatever the love is, there will always be boiling emotions and even spoiler of moods that can dissipate years of happiness in one blow. Sad but true, I have unfortunately seen too many of such cases, much to my dislike. The only thing I can do for them is to enlighten them using Astrology, and prepare them for potential scenarios of what could be, and ways to overcome or smooth the situation.

There was a story on the news about a woman who was so possessive of her man that she doused him with inflammable and lit him on fire. Because she was so insecure, she not only killed her husband, she also lost her home. Now, she sits in prison wondering what possessed her to commit such a heinous crime. It made me think about other relationships I have seen in the past. There were two youngsters, fresh out of high school. Madly in love, the boy was despaired when the girl was taken overseas to further her studies. Year after year, they kept their love alive through letters and Internet correspondence. When the girl finished her studies, she flew back to be with him. It was all well and good, until the boy decided that she was in his way and used that as an excuse to break up with her out of the blue. Broken and lost, the girl took awhile to get over that betrayal after 10 years of dedicated love to him, but she became better for it and is enjoying her life now.

There is this guy I know who has what everyone would possibly call “unconditional love”. He married a woman who could not do anything. Could not clean, could not work, could not cook, could do nothing. Nevertheless, he did everything. He worked for her, cleaned for her, cooked for her, and took care of her needs. With time, his cooking abilities improved so much that he became a great chef, and was offered a job overseas. His wife allowed him to pursue the job, saying that she would be content at home with the maid. Like that, he went and worked hard. But he only loved his wife, and his love brought them prosperity. Strange like fiction, this relationship actually worked out because he loved this woman so much.

Sure, love can easily go bad. Couples that have been married for eons can wave goodbye to their love if they don't take consistent effort to love their partners. There are down times when you have to let your partners do their own thing and just trust in them. There are also people that I classify as user-friendly, whereby they change partners as easily as clothes, depending on what their moods are. Because of such people, I have to say that perhaps it isn't love that is the problem, but people. If you can solve people problems, maybe love will be easier to unfold. Whatever it is, love entails being tolerant, enduring, and you have to go through several hurts before you find the right one. You cannot be impatient or assume everything with love; you can only love a person for being who they are and love every moment that you are with them because that is what makes life worthwhile.

I wish everyone will be able to find love in their life, the kind of love that makes you ride through tough times, but still makes life worthwhile in the end.
